

N=800 adult residents of the Greater Washington region; conducted December 1-5, 2015.

Bridge Crossing North of American Legion Bridge

There is strong support for adding another bridge crossing north of the American Legion Bridge, to provide a direct link between the I-270 corridor in Maryland and the Dulles corridor in Virginia. Almost six in ten residents across the region (59%) favor creating a new bridge crossing, with almost four in ten (39%) strongly favoring a new bridge.

Only 11% are opposed to a new bridge crossing, with just 7% opposing it strongly. One in four (28%) are neutral.

Fairfax County closely mirrors the region, with 59% in favor and 32% strongly in favor of a northern bridge crossing. Only 9% of Fairfax County residents are opposed.

Support for a new river crossing is much greater in Montgomery County. Two-thirds (68%) of Montgomery residents support the new crossing, with a majority (52%) supporting it strongly. In Montgomery County, only 12% are opposed, with 9% opposing it strongly.

Prince Georgians are just as likely to favor a new river crossing north of the American Legion Bridge, with 64% in favor and only 3% opposed.

Region-wide, Republicans are the most supportive of a new bridge crossing, with 70% in favor and only 6% opposed. Independents favor a bridge crossing by a margin of 64% to 9%, while a 40-point margin of Democrats also favor it by 53% to 13%.